Clay's Handbook of Environmental Health – 20th Edition

Stephen Battersby is a freelance Housing and Environmental Health Consultant and is an Associate of the WHO Collaborating Centre on Housing Standards and Health at the University of Warwick and Visiting Senior Fellow in the Faculty of Health and Medical Sciences at the University of Surrey. He is also currently President of the Chartered Institute of Environmental Health.

About the book

Clay's Handbook of Environmental Health, since its first publication in 1933, has provided a definitive guide for the environmental health practitioner or reference for the consultant or student. This twentieth edition continues as a first point of reference, Although focused on the curriculum of the UK's Chartered Institute of Environmental Health and dealing with the UK situation, underlying this are international public and environmental health principles which should, taking account of the impact of climate change, readily suit the generalist or specialist working outside the UK.

Table of Contents

The early chapters consider the philosophical basis and principles of environmental health, and skills and knowledge requirements such as communication skills, practice and promotion of environmental health including research skills; understanding business (as the regulated or as employee of the EHP); forms of construction from buildings to transport and related matters relevant to environmental health. Also addressed is how environmental health is delivered in the UK and Republic of Ireland demonstrating the range of organisations that contribute. A chapter is devoted to the role of law and its enforcement in environmental health. The chapter on human physiology and health addresses toxicology and radiation and health as well as communicable diseases. The following few chapters address the specific risk areas and aspects of environmental health, housing and the domestic environment, food and food safety, the work and leisure environments, water and environmental health, air and air quality, pest management and vector control, waste and land and related issues, noise and vibration. The final chapters consider specific issues, such as environmental management systems, environmental health in disasters, environmental health at sea and air ports and the international dimension.
